Comments: I am a former logger with a few comments. I like the way logging used to be conducted, only trees 14" in diameter or larger were cut. The end result was a forest that was still intact and able to produce acorns, nuts, fruits and other mast, thereby supporting animals and people. I am very opposed to clear cutting, especially on steep slopes. That should be outlawed. It results in a jungle of plants, fighting to occupy the cleared space. Also, soil erosion is great. Already present in the soil are large number of trees and vines and seeds just waiting for the opportunity to spring up. The result is an impenetrable growth that a rabbit can hardly negotiate. It takes many years to mature and become usable by people and larger animals.

Please eliminate the clear cut from this plan and instead only perform select cutting.
