Comments: At a time when protecting forests is so vital to our environment, it does not make sense to do extensive logging in a valuable forest. Furthermore, from what I understand, the forest service does not actually do the logging. Instead it hires a company to do it. Based on what I have seen in the Daniel Boone National Forest, the companies do not seem to take the proper precautions to protect old trees, habitat, and water--nor prevent erosion. I believe our forest is much more valuable as it is.

When making decisions, including oversight of projects, I believe the forest service should consider what is best for the environment and not be influenced by money from outside groups. Any logging should be supervised by people knowledgeable in proper logging practices.
