Title:

Comments: Just what we need!-- another Canadian resources company dizzyingly happy to tear up the American environment for its monetary value. But, hey! It's just "a group of Idahoans" out to better the lives of locals. You won't find the company's Canadian origin mentioned in the company's website, but its corporate predecessor, Midas Gold, reveals--once you do a deep dive into the "Articles" section of "The Company"--that Midas was incorporated under Section 42(2)(a)(iv) of the British Columbia Business Corporations Act. Not surprisingly, the Board of Perpetua is identical to that of Midas, with the addition of Laura Dove, a former Ford exec. Surprisingly, though, their Board bios are identical, word for word. Board member Chris Robison boasts a background with Rio Tinto Minerals, the Brazilian mega-corp famous for ruining environments around the world. We need to make sure that Idahoans understand that Perpetua is not "a group of Idahoans", but a multi-national corporation headquartered in British Columbia, Canada. They don't care about the environment except to the extent they are required to comply with American environmental law; about which, of course, they will lie, misdirect and seek variances for. (I can't help but wonder if the Board's bios were different before Midas changed its name to Perpetua.)
