Comments: It would seem that there are many reasons both environmental and ecological to forgo the intrusive introduction of the stibnite mine, however what i would like to make most clear is the concern I have for the way these industrial actions reflect on us as a human race, and their detrimental impact on our own souls and karmic growth. When we has a species break the natural ties between us and the natural world through are own paradigms of godlike superiority over mother earth, we allow our selves the toxic privilege to claim lordship over land and life alike, this inevitably leads us to rake our greedy fingers through the earth and take as we please. I simply ask that we all take a moment to reflect on our mental constructs of how we see the world and attempt to realize their origins, do they come from a sense of union and kinship with our earth mother? or do they stem from the infinitely greedy and spiritually blinded root of capitalism and industry? we all grew up in a world under a single unified concept that humanity rules, do we have the courage to ask the question "what if the way we learned to see world may be fundamentally and horribly flawed" I ask that we all turn our intentions with real intent to the earth, and to our own inner and inherent connection with her, I believe that in doing this the choice to or to not to build a mine in the wilderness will be self evident and unquestionable.
