Comments: As an experienced OHV motorcycle rider, I often come across beginner/intermediate riders attempting a challenging section with no experience to guide them. This often leads to these riders failing at their attempts and possibly injuring themselves. Or, as often is the case, they resort to making an alternate route around the difficult obstacle. I do see the need for an Enduro Training Loop that will teach these beginner and intermediates riders (and even experienced riders) the proper techniques for tackling the different obstacles they will encounter while riding in the Colorado Mountains. Hopefully it would include fallen trees, rutted uphill sections, rocky sections where you have to constantly stop and change direction to navigate through, trails that are covered with roots, and everything else the various Colorado Trail systems will throw at you. It is always better to improve your skills and familiarize yourself with your bike's abilities in a controlled environment - before heading out to the remote areas where danger is just around the next bend.
