Comments: Anytime humans decide to change the natural outcome of nature things seem to go from bad but manageable through nature's ways to address issues that have been used since the beginning of humans interjecting their "wisdom"(?) where it doesn't belong and ultimately makes problem areas much worse and/or unmanageable. So it's set to reason from past events the best and least problematic outcomes will be reached when humans let nature run its course as it sees fit without adding any human element and follow this path and over years check on the progress made minus human interference versus humans making decisions based upon their knowledge on a certain subject be it right or wrong in the end things are usually worse off than if left alone to mother nature's true wisdom. The only input from the human side that may be acceptable would come from native tribes of said areas and/or TRUE Indigenous wisdom that has played out thru the ages that is coming from humans that have ALWAYS believed in their natural environment and those that were left alone to be managed by these true experts following their love of surrounding land, sea and air which is truly remarkable. There always comes a time to DO NOTHING-seems right for these lands as well.
