Comments: This is a colossal waste of resources for a non-existent problem because bolts don't impact anything except the surface of the rock where they're placed. People in parks make the impact, not the bolts. Removing the bolts creates uncountable safety issues as well as contributes to renewed bolt placing, very probably in a NEW spot on the rock, which in turn leaves random empty holes from the removed bolts, which are actually more visible than the bolt in most cases and contribute to greater erosion as wind and water now have a new access point in the rock. Honestly, unless lobbyists are paying a huge sum to some politicians to make this a thing, why is it even on the docket?
