Comments: The limiting of the use of protection devices such as bolts on national park or other protected lands will significantly disrupt or eliminate climbing in some of these places, which has a rich history and is part of the fabric of the sport growing, in both the US and the world. Climbers by nature are some of the more aware and sustainable minded athletes, and very much follow the "Leave no trace" ethos. There must be other ways to achieve the goal without completely destroying the sport in places like Yosemite national park.
