Comments: Prohibiting fixed anchors would cause major safety concerns, as climbers rely on these to safely navigate outdoor routes. They are critical to practicing an established sport that is even now recognized by the Olympics and has a rich history in the United States. There are alternatives to prohibiting these, there could alternatively be regulation around who can install them, what materials are used, or even how the anchor holes are created. But outright banning them makes no logical sense given the past history of their conservative use and the safe practice supported by numerous outdoor organizations.
