Comments: Some form of fixed hardware is necessary in order to keep rock climbing alive which has been an essential representation of America's landscapes and freedoms from John Muir to President Obama congregating an ascent of El Capitan which is cliff in a national park that has fixed anchors which people have been using for 100 years without causing any issues to the environment. Also as a route developer I know we all try to be as discreet as possible when placing bolts. We will paint them to the exact color of the rock therefore causing no visual pollution of the area and it also has no negative environmental impact so it just doesn't make any sense to ban it.
