Comments: The history of Rock Climbing goes hand and hand with national parks. Without the support of the United States national park system the sport of Rock Climbing would have failed to progress to the Olympic stage it now has achieved. To ban the future of bolting, and discourage further progression of the sport will affect the national parks in more ways than one - the climbing community is a vast, open, and inspiring community, that through the bonded alliances of Climbers, we have overcome great odds to showcase how to live and thrive in nature. There is no other sport quite like it, and that makes me question why this is even up for debate. The USA would revolt if the NFL, NBA, or any other prolific spectating sport had these threats placed over them. So why is it that one of the most humbling, accepting, physically and mentally challenging sports is being questioned? Please review this horrific plan to ban climbing in the parks; as we would never say you can't drive an RV into nature, something that is extremely damaging to the parks. The health and safety of our parks greatly depends on this decision being halted and erased from any consciousness.
