Comments: I support the feed grounds fully. All of the migration tendencies that theses elk herds used 100 years are gone. Even if they did migrate they are walking highways, competing with Deer, antelope and bighorn sheep for winter feed.

They also are now in peoples yards whom have build houses, cabins and ranches where these animals have to go. The ranching community will struggle with elk in hay stacks until they all starve get hit by cars or get shot in a hay stack trying to survive.

I get the disease argument that they will get at the feed grounds. That will happen anyway somewhere else in a ranchers haystack. Last winter taught us that when it's bad they all bunch up anyway. I live in Idaho I promise you that last winter our elk and deer herds bunched up on any feed they could find. If there were any left in the spring they transferred disease to each other.

We as humans have ruined the winter range for these herds, they have no where positive to go.
