Comments: The Wilderness Act prohibits installations and structures like permanent fixed climbing anchors in order to protect the areas' wild character. Fixed climbing anchors absolutely must not be allowed in Wilderness. The Wilderness Act's strict prohibitions, including its prohibition on installations, cannot and should not be overcome by a desire to facilitate or enhance a particular form of recreation, and this narrow administrative exception for installations certainly does not extend to the general public when seeking to create more developed recreational activities in Wilderness.

The agencies' primary duty is to protect Wilderness in its natural, untrammelled state, and the Wilderness Act's has always been banned on these installations can only be overcome in rare administrative circumstances where the installation is necessary to protect Wilderness in its natural, untrammelled state.

Agencies have no duty to develop Wilderness to provide additional "opportunities for primitive recreation."

Wilderness, by its very existence, provides these opportunities-the agencies need only to protect the Wilderness according to the strict provisions of the Wilderness Act to safeguard the opportunity.

Climbing without permanent fixed anchors is generally compatible with wilderness preservation. While it may be true that fewer people will climb certain routes in Wilderness if they don't have fixed bolts or other permanently-installed protection, natural limits on use is not a bad thing when it comes to wilderness protection, particularly with the recent explosion of outdoor recreation uses in Wilderness.

For those climbers seeking developed climbing opportunities, there are more than enough ample permanently bolted climbs outside of Wilderness.

Wilderness is getting to be an endangered landscape. Less than 3 percent of land in the Lower 48 is protected as Wilderness, and it is under more threats than ever before including from rapidly escalating recreation pressures. Any specific proposals for permanent fixed anchor installations in Wilderness must be subjected to public notice and an opportunity for public comment pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act.
