Comments: Restricting the establishment of new routes to "existing climbing opportunities" on non-Wilderness lands is unenforceable. This will create massive confusion and cannot easily be enforced. Climbers will continue establishing new routes and ultimately it will make for a more dangerous encounter between the land manager, nature, and the climber. Climbing does not damage the environment or rock any-more so than wind and water erosion. Thousands of years after we are gone, new rocks will form and old rocks will crumble.
