

Data Submitted (UTC 11): 1/29/2024 11:44:40 PM

First name: Danielle

Last name: Lehsten

Organization:

Title:

Comments: Often when new proposals come out concerning our National Parks, Forests and Public Lands with respect to climbing they are composed of all out bans, not intelligent arguments about access and regulations that would keep climbing accessible, safe and respectful to other users of National Parks (albeit typically from their cars). I am consistently surprised the USFS does not productively work with climbers (our country is a democracy) but instead villifies us. Some (most of the proposals) are so outrageous to common sense and any understanding of climbing that it appears instead you of wanting to enrich the lives our citizens of the United States you simply want to eliminate enjoyment because it is easier to just say no and/or ban. Therefore, missing out on any subtlety or nuance for which there is so much in climbing. First and foremost, climbers do not negatively impact National Parks, Forests and Public Lands as it is portrayed. Bolts, chalk, dirty climbers etc. are imperceptible to most except a vociferous minority. Taking away and prohibiting safety, and essential gear, for climbs seems literally insane. Why? The only reason is you don't want climbers in the National Park. To not allow for new route development and equipment decries a lack of understanding of the sport of climbing. Should we still be using hemp ropes and pitons? Should any sport be limited to the standards of a decade ago? Would you limit someone from jumping higher or running faster because of what? It is bad for National Parks somehow? I understand this method of writing may not be the most productive but dealing with the USFS can be like dealing with a bully. The National Parks and Forests and public Lands and are for everyone. You may not like climbers for whatever reasons but we have a valid and right as US citizens to a voice and representation no matter what you may think of us. We do not graffiti the rock and leave trash and leave the bathroom disgusting. Those are park tourists. I was appalled on my last visit of Red Rock National Conservation area of how abused the park looked. It was not the climbers. With all hope and intelligence and understanding outside of what you may know about climbing, I hope you gain insight to how your policies will be beyond damaging to climbing at some of the most exceptional and stunningly beautiful places in the United States. Climbers are the ones who get out of our cars and breath in the grandiose outdoors and protect it and guard it with our lives. We hope you let us protect our lives while climbing and continue to grow our exceptional sport.