

Data Submitted (UTC 11): 1/30/2024 7:47:15 PM

First name: Go

Last name: Clemson

Organization:

Title:

Comments: Your decisions matter for setting new examples and trends. Habitual too long-standing coddling of various industries to take advantage of wild lands for what boils down to personal financial gain is NOT OK for the long-term sustainability of humanity on Earth, as wild places are destroyed and encroached upon at a staggering pace. This goes for Petro, mining, paper/lumber, but also to all sorts of "guiding" services on land and water.

Wilderness status is great but impermanent and fragile, easily reversed by exploiters winning enough seats in government to write new laws. As is, there is already apparently NO place farther than 21.5 miles from some sort of road in our lower 48 ! Too many want too many more roads and trails for gas or electric powered invasion.

Visitors into designated Wilderness are not supposed to be making manmade alterations of Wilderness. Period. I have already witnessed unmonitored horse packers overcrowding and invasively constructing eye sore "conveniences" and overgrazing and trampling in the Sierras, until supervision was switched to more adjacent offices and their invasive practices were reversed to restore better wilderness experience for all the other visitors.

Meanwhile, similarly, attitudes about "providing access" (including cellphone coverage) must change too. Making wild places "more accessible," is the perfect recipe for the inevitable and complete demise of those wondrous places. Yogi Berra nailed it when he said "No one goes there any more...it's too crowded!"

Do the right thing for humanity's attitudes and preservation of wild places with their myriad of organisms. More respect and appreciation for all places and beings, vs more myopic ANTHRONARCISSISTIC exploitation, whether any humans can get there or not because of remoteness and purposeful "LACK of man-made access".