Comments: This is not a good idea. Not only is it ruining decades of hard work by those who took the time to explore and create these amazing areas. This doesn't just impact climbing but canyoneering, rappelling and creating a safety issue for rescue when unaware people go out to these places and the equipment need to enjoy these areas is gone. This will also effect parks with tourism. Take for instance Yosemite. They've made dozens of movies about the accolades of climbers throughout the generations. Are we going to just end all of that. You may say no but how many employees in the park service, already undermanned, has the ability to even get to some of these places. Those using these areas are incredibly safe and take better care of the areas than any other groups of visitors. Please do not pass this
