Comments: Climbing has become an amazing part of our national parks and open spaces. Places like Yosemite and RMNP have hundreds of climbs that maintain a critical piece of history for many people. Limiting not only the ability to further progress the sport but also maintain the pieces of climbing history would be a travesty. By all means climbing has a low impact onto national lands but generates a large source of tourist revenue as well as has a large base of very motivated people. They work to ensure that climbing is done respectfully and safely and should be given the liberty to continue to do so.
