Comments: I have been recreating on federal and state lands for over 25 years now and it has been in integral part of my life. I have done so as a hiker, boater, skier, and climber. Our federal and state lands are a big part of what makes this country so great, and the freedom to recreate as we choose in these areas is a core part of the American identity. As climbers, we choose to interact with our environment in a manner that involves certain levels of risk. The choice to do so part of the freedom that this country protects. Fixed anchors in wilderness areas help minimize some of this risk and have a precedent of over 60 years of being part of the landscape. I believe that spending tax payer dollars on a policy that will remove and prohibit a large portion of these is against the interest of those tax payers. This will create many dangerous situation where climbers will have to take significant risk that they may not have had to in the past. America has been the birth ground if much of modern climbing and modern clean climbing practices . I believe that any policy that threatens to destroy many years of history and precedent is un American
