Comments: If you want to save some old growth forest around where I live (Rural Nevada); then don't use wildfires as an excuse to enable water grabs - with "prescribed" defoliation, deforestation, and intentional (though possibly temporary) localized extinction efforts. You don't save the forest by killing it. It makes no sense to drive the pine jay towards extinction to make room for the threatened sage grouse. And it will eventually be seen as evil to kill plants that provide us food sustainably for free - to make room for food we have to pay greedy corporations for - or it gets sent somewhere else in the world - and inevitably we Natives can starve, go without water, and have no natural world to support us. I see this effort to help old growth forest as a step in the right direction, but killing forest in the wild so that we can plant trees in the cities just makes these cities even more desperate for rural water. And we taxpayers are being forced to pay for this insanity. Near my house, the Forest Service chopped down every tree near a burn area above it. Think about that. The Forest "Service" deforested a live forest to save a burned one. If humanity goes extinct, we earned it.
