Comments: Please draft the strongest possible rule to protect both old-growth and mature forests from commercial logging! Timber companies should not be able to strip our national forests of ecologically vital carbon-sequestering trees for their own profit; they've done more than enough ecological and cultural damage to this continent already, and if they want to stay in business, they can and should put their own money into acquiring privately-held land and putting their own tree farm there. We collectively need and depend on the myriad ecosystem services provided by healthy forests - e.g., rain generation; temperature moderation; food production; water filtration; habitat provision for the animals which would otherwise go extinct or, as in the case of some "nuisance" wildlife, be forced into unhealthily close proximity to humans - and, given the damage we've already done and are continuing to do to our country's old-growth and mature forests via both logging and anthropogenic climate change, our surviving forests need all the protection they can get. Please draft the strongest possible protections and implement them as swiftly as possible! Thank you!
