Comments: I think it is unconscionable for JHMR to destroy a swath of whitebark pine, a species that is has can live for 1000 years in remote places, a species that it is already being devastated by pinebark beetles, a species that faces extinction because of global warming. And here is JHMR wanting to add more runs, a via ferrata, making of a once-beautiful mountain area another Disney Land, all in an effort to entice more visitors who travel here in droves already...via automobile and via airlines and via private jets... all of which increase our tiny valley's carbon footprint. What the heck, folks!!! As global warming/storming continues, JHMR will add more and more snow-making equipment which again uses up more of the earth's finite resources. Please connect the dots. Haven't we learned that such actions are unsustainable!?!? Not everything is about the almighty dollar. Or is it?
