Comments: Sounds like our woods, rivers and streams are being sold out for the almighty money. Like they say to find the trouble follow the money trail. Effects of approval of commercial activities that can degrade strikes home with our wild and scenic river threats and locals possibly losing their rights to the river and face permits. The comment of permit holders treating members of the public is an ongoing issue across even our forests. On a old river road access that has been a boat launch for years, I had an out of state camper throw a lit hibachi at myself and pontoon boat and told his unleashed dog to charge me. One of our local campgrounds does not enforce most rules including dogs running at large and chasing the wildlife. Maps showing camp locations and the extent of the areas often used by the permittee and more information and background on the renters is all imperative. One battle that I assume you have is the tourists using a GPS site on their cell phones that not only lists the GPS location but then lists this as a campground. We find out of state folks in very strange spots. Open fires, tossing dog poop, toilet paper into creeks or hooking up their black tanks to their campers which are camping with wheels in the creek bed. You have problems all over Western Montana and we also need some help besides just the Bob. Thanks.
