Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act.

I have strong family ties to Alaska and the differences between Alaska and the Yukon Territory are dramatic. There are cabins everywhere in Alaska often surrounded by dead vehicles and junk. This is not the case in the Yukon Territory where the wilderness remains mostly pristine. Please do not allow more cabins in remote Alaska.
