Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA, the Wilderness Act, and Forest Service Wilderness management policy objective to make wilderness more pure. The Wilderness Act clearly states that Wilderness is supposed to be undeveloped, and the Forest Service has an opportunity to reduce the amount of development here by phasing these cabins out, which is exactly what the Forest Service should do in the best interest of the public.
