Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act. My family formerly had a lease on a similar cabin years ago within Lassen Volcanic National Park. It was build prior to the creation of that national park. We knew well in advance that the cabin would be demolished after its grandfathered private use expired in 1999, and the area restored to its wild undeveloped state. We did not fight it because we knew that the eventual removal of the cabin, and others nearby, was the right thing to do. The ANILCA cabins have remained within public lands for too long already, they must be removed in order for the designated wilderness to be truly wild. Cabins have no rightful place within wilderness areas.

Thank you.
