Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act.

Wilderness means just that. No human habitation. No human structures. As unspoiled as possible. Given the overcrowding of much of the US, it is even more important to respect wilderness preserves and maintain them as wilderness.
