Comments: The original language of the restrictions should stand. The intent was to phase out these illegally built cabins and other structures in a wilderness area. But the restrictions allowed the original violator and immediate family use of said property until the last to die. That sounds fair. Actually more than fair. The present restrictions honor the pioneering spirit of the original builder/owner, but allows the land to return to being a wilderness.

On all my trips to Alaska, I've enjoyed the wilderness the most. I am grateful that there are such lands free to be wild. Here in Florida, not much land is left for wilderness. The State seems determined to pave and profit from any land in the most environmentally destructive way possible.

That is not sustainable. See what Florida has done. And. Don't do it.
