Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness, and these illegal cabins have had more than enough life to be phased out. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent.

These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, they were illegal to begin with, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act. Who would changing the policy benefit- a few owners, versus preserving the land for all. I for one am tired of the few thinking that rules don't apply to them, and that they can deny what is good for all for their own benefit.

America is better than this. Stop the permits and allow the land to be wilderness.
