Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act.

There is absolutely NO reason why these cabins should continue to be used by private parties on public lands maintained by public funds. The phase out is essential to restore the natural ecosystem of the areas in question and should NOT be given over to private entities. To change the policy is to open pandora's box to other changes in favor of private entities over the public interest.
