Comments: We must minimize human imprint in designated wilderness areas. The Forest Service originally made the right decision when it decided to phase out the use of cabins in these wild lands. Human structures bring with it human scents, food smells, trash, and pollution, all of which is incompatible with wilderness areas. Keep wilderness wild. Keep to the original plan and end the use of cabin permits. We want our citizens to be out in nature because nature provides us with many physical and mental benefits. However, a saying from long ago says it best: Leave only footprints.
