Comments: Cabins don't belong in designated Wilderness. The U.S. Forest Service must leave its policy unchanged and phase out ANILCA cabins, as was the original intent. These cabins were never meant to persist in Wilderness, and to change this policy would undermine ANILCA and the Wilderness Act. Permits for these cabins were never meant to be permanent, but were intended to terminate upon the death of the last family member of the original lease holder. That should still be the case. Cabins do not belong in a wilderness area. It's no longer a wilderness when there's human permanent habitation that disrupts the wilderness ecosystem and all of the species that depend on it. Please do not change the policy. Phase out these cabins as was originally intended.
