Comments: I have lived in the Rattlesnake my entire life--my first camping trips, first times fishing, first runs, first biking trips, first bears were all in the Rattlesnake National Recreation Area. The RNRA has been host to much of the meaningful substance of my life, and its historical management has been the thing that allowed for it. Citizens who fought for the Rattlesnake Act saw that it has both incredible recreational value and a vital need for protection. To open the RNRA to logging, road building, and concentrated recreation would be foolish and a far cry from the values we share as stewards of the land. I do not agree with the PA, and believe that a separate Management Area should be created to maintain the necessary low-impact management that has benefitted the RNRA for so long.
