Comments: I'm most interested in the shelter that's proposed near twin sisters mountains. That public land is already difficult to access due to private land. To me that's already a mismanagement of public land. To further develop it without making sure that there's equitable access first seems like the wrong priority. Having structure that's managed by a private club/organization on public land that's already hard to access, can result in further restriction of public land usage. Having the organization self report on clean-up of human waste in difficult to access area is also a poor idea. How often is that area managed by public employees? What happens if the organization does not manage clean up properly? Poorly managed cleanup by private entities is a long standing issue. We do not need to introduce more waste into remote places. Make the area accessible to the public first. Then we can think about development
