Though not specifically versed in this particular project, I am extremely concerned about forest management in general, and would like my view accepted as such.

The vast majority of land in this country and elsewhere is devoted to human habitation, agriculture, and industry, and much of the rest fragmented by roads, power lines, and pipelines. Very little remains in parks, wilderness areas and national forests, yet it is from these areas that the Earth will regenerate itself once people and their government agencies are able to regulate human activities from a holistic perspective.

I suggest we leave the Jellico forest and all its air, water, soil and habitat restorative capacities alone until we better know how to care for the only known source of life in creation.
