Comments: Old growth forests are our history. They were this land from the Atlantic Ocean coast to the plains and then back again to the Pacific Ocean. The percentage of acres left with their original habitat can hardly be calculated.

They are not only living history, they are active science classrooms and living museums. They should be protected at all cost. When they are gone there is no replacing them. Gone forever .

There are adequate secondary growth timber strands to harvest. There are abundant tracts of disturbed earth for building on.

The Potomac river in Washington DC had once a water clarity of an alpine lake with twenty foot sturgeon and dolphin abounding , the shoreline overhung with massive old growth forest.

This would be another world to visit with all the amazing sound's, sights, and stimuli.

A long time gone now but this was our history, our beginning.

Let us save every acre of this reminder of our history and this lost world, that we can.

Please, for future generations
