Comments: Utah wilderness was part of my growing up. If this structure were in another location, less remote, it may be fit for historic preservation. However, where it is located, it should be allowed to fade back to nature. What action and materials and noise it would take to rebuild it is the antithesis of the Wilderness Act--keeping wild areas wild. What is left should be seen as a temporary structure in the process of returning to nature. It served its purpose for its time. That time is over.
