Comments: Isn't it the primary responsibility of the Forest Service to protect what's left of our unspoiled wilderness, so that it remains unspoiled? In the case of the Mount Timpanogos Wilderness, how does the presence of the Quinoset hut contribute towards, or help to preserve, that wildness? Since the Forest Service's own policy acknowledges that such a structure is not necessary for visitor use, why hang onto it, and why replace it with a new one? Wouldn't it be more appropriate to allow the metal remnants of the Quinoset hut to simply fade and break down naturally, or to simply remove it without the use of helicopters or motorized tools?
