Comments: Sometimes it is best to leave nature alone. We as humans seem to be compelled to "improve" upon our natural world. All we are really doing is degrading a magnificent and rugged landscape that should inspire awe, but little else.

It is antithetical to Wilderness philosophy and to the government's own documents to permit a permanent structure upon this hallowed ground. The government's first mission is to protect the wilderness character of these mountains. The removal of the remains of the existing structure should be used by non-mechanized tools only or left to degrade naturally.

There are few areas left in the country without a firm human footprint: let this be one of those.
