Quonset hut in the Mount Timpanogos Wilderness

Before the forest service takes one more step, or takes one more breath, and regard to the Quonset hut in this Utah, Wilderness, I'd demand that you read the text of the 1964 wilderness act. If you do, so, you will discover, much to your surprise, I am sure, that the la absolutely prevents the actions you are proposing in regard to the rebuilding of the structure.

To suggest that the structure has characteristics that make it part of the Wilderness, is a completely asinine concept to hold, especially for some agency that supposedly is to follow the law and make sure the quality of the wilderness is maintained.

Wilderness areas are not to have any permanent structures and travelers in the wilderness undertake their own security. It denies the whole idea of Wilderness and the Wilderness act to suggest now we must have places for people to hide when they are not prepared for a Wilderness trip.

To propose using helicopters and motorized equipment to tear down and rebuild the structure is just as foolish and out of the allowances of the Wilderness act.

If you want to get rid of the structure, it has to be done using non-mechanized means. The structure was built without helicopters, and it can be taken down with out the helicopters and mechanized equipment.

Either let it fall down and rust away or get a contractor to cut it up and pack it out on horses.

Hi unequivocally oppose this project

Where, in all the world and the universe do you come up with these insane ideas that pretend there is no instruction from Congress on the matter of Wilderness. Perhaps a course in the law in regard to wilderness is an order for this office.

Let the Wilderness alone!
