Comments: I am so happy to see this common sense approach to fire management. It's time the National Forest started actively managing forests again. The pendulum swinging from active management to "fire is natural, let it burn" has destroyed our forests in the west. We're tired of terrible air quality across the west due to fires thousands of miles away, and forests that are burned up and won't be the same in our lifetime. I am happy to see this plan and I think it will be implemented with care unlike the clear cutting of the past. Also, I'd rather see the forest logged, than burned up. I think it's likely better for climate change and the environment. We talk about carbon from vehicle emissions, what about forest fires?
