Comments: I am a landowner in La Grande and someone who deeply cares about the ecology of the region. It's hard to think about the wellness of one area on Eastern Oregon without thinking about the wellness of the whole region. The Morgan Nesbit forest project has been proven to be a swath of land that migration has occurred in. Given the geological restraints of the eastern side of the state, it's important to remind ourselves of how necessary very specific land regions are. The Morgan Nesbit is one. Please consider the mammal migration and all the ecological factors that play into their movement. I understand the need for natural resources, but please consider the science to find the most appropriate place for harvest.
