Comments: I just wanted to express my dismay with the recent Draft EIS findings.

As usual with most public documents, while they surely contain much detail and important information it's buried in pages and pages of boiler plate and documentation. Nowhere does someone distill up the information into a concise executive summary at the beginning of each section that is easy to read and understand. So the information remains buried in a huge document that very very few people will ever read. This is the case with your most recent results.

Is this done out of laziness or is it on purpose to keep the public from truly understanding the content of the document?
