Comments: I am not surprised that there are no lands deemed by some as more sacred than for their exploitable resources. The policies that are substantiating such progress know of no travesty abounding. The proper disposal of objections and those who may harbor them should have expeditious managing.

A proper measure of progress in these times is quantifiable by diligent pressures made to parties with sufficient cachet to lever by near-automatic hearing, given only once, that settles the interests into signed pieces of paper.

There are the distant, ancient, claims to be colonized in the new periods of acquisition so that the gaping changes will be accomplished rather than the protest. Need is an iron matter.

And so there will be resistance and challenge, and for more than the sake of identity.
