Comments: As an archaeologist, a former cultural resource specialist for both the National Park Service and Bureau of Land Management, a former Park Ranger at Mesa Verde and the National Mall, and a current park ranger for Lake Sidney Lanier(USACE), I cannot express how terrible of an idea it would be to allow this. Ignoring the cultural importance of this space, the environmental impact would catastrophic. Any economic gains are only temporary and destroy the long term economic opportunities provided by the rare pristine environment here that is disappearing faster and faster. When you factor in the unique and critical cultural role of this landscape it becomes a no brainer. I pray there is some logic and common sense left and this is all just part of the process you are forced to do and there is no serious consideration of this assault on the public's land, the private value of this land and what it could mean for the rest of what remains of genuinely special places.
