Comments: Carefully managing what is left of the dilapidated structure is the best all around option. First, clean up the material remaining of the toilets that could damage the environment. Second, post a warning that the structure must not be used or disturbed by visitors. Third, post a modest, eco-friendly educationally historic marker entitled "Lessons Learned" that tells the story of the marker, highlighting how best-intentions (building the structure for large group use) led to over use and damage of natural resources THIS IS perhaps most important action to take: promote the mission of the National Park Service, and maintain the usefulness of the site without further damage. The only concession to building a new structure might be to provide a state-of-the-art, one-person eco-friendly 'out house.'
