Comments: In an age of extinction, when precious, irreplaceable species--and habitats--are being lost at a heartbreaking pace, it is an unimaginable misallocation of scarce resources to trample precious wilderness--and the spirit of the wilderness--in order to gain access to and repair a stinky old sheet metal Quonset hut... that would better be left to the forces of nature and time to dismantle. Please let the hut die and re-dedicate yourself to life--to preserving and protecting natural habitat and the creatures, human included, that require that habitat to thrive and survive in every sense of those words. The hut is a historical footnote, and deserves mention in a history of Mount Timpanogos Wilderness, but it is not five-alarm priority for the Forest Service, as so many things truly are. Life first, including the massive problem of invasives. Historical footnotes last.
