Comments: Don't give away public lands to a handful of private executives. Are you kidding me? This is the type of thing that makes the Forest Service look bad. You want to hand 1600 acres of ecologically sensitive areas to a greedy ski resort? That's not the way to develop private/public partnerships. To me it sounds more like a private/private deal. As in you would rather do this without any input from the public. God forbid you have to think of the American public that pay to maintain the lands that you want to hand off to the highest bidder. Dumb. The only land that I might be able to pass down to future generations is the public lands that I camp on, hike on, fish, hunt, and enjoy. The notion that we should shrink public access to benefit a private company is sickening to me. Those are my lands. Bought and paid for by the generations of Americans that believed the best thing to ever come out of the government was an understanding that the US landscapes are timeless and worthy of protection.

If you go through with this you should be ashamed. This land was not set aside to one day be handed over to those with enough wealth and power to rip it away from the public. It was set aside for the public.
