Comments: To Whom It May Concern,

The Wasatch Mountains are one of Salt Lake City's most valuable assets. They provide clean drinking water, world-class recreation, wildlife habitat, and a direct connection to nature that makes this region a unique place to live and work.

As someone who regularly recreates in the Wasatch, I strongly support efforts to restore and protect Big Cottonwood Canyon and its watershed. Any future management decisions should prioritize the long-term health of the canyon, including water quality, ecosystem resilience, and preservation of the natural character that draws so many people to these mountains.

The Wasatch is not just a backdrop to the city-it is a critical resource that contributes to Utah's quality of life, economy, and identity. Protecting and restoring it should remain a top priority for future generations.

Thank you for your consideration.
