Comments: Please not do not do this. This will go terribly wrong and some of our most beautiful mountains could be destroyed if any of these fires gets out of control - which is very likely-as we've all witnessed multiple fires break out everywhere in Utah over just this past week alone. The ecosystem will be affected. Wildlife will be affected. People that live here for summer activities to spend time in the mountains will be affected because it will be unhealthy to be in the mountains and hike while there are high levels of smoke. People with poor health conditions like asthma will be affected. Cut down some trees to thin the forest if you must - & find a way to actually use that wood-but a prescribed burn with toxins is something that our already bad air quality cannot handle. The citizens of the state are already being choked by the smoke from surrounding wildfires every summer-even fires as far away as other states, and the inversion in the winter from pollution continues to worsen year after year with the continuing population growth. As many of us are seeing plainly this week alone, fire is not something that can be easily controlled or managed. It seems like the most dangerous way to try to resolve whatever problem is being listed as the basis of this as some sort of necessity.
